Guanziling Mud Spring: The Guanziling Hot Spring area was the first developed around the turn of the 19th century. It is said that the springs were discovered at that time by Japanese troops stationed in Chiayi. The first hot spring inn, Yoshidaya (now the Reikei Hot Spring Resort), opened in 1902 and quickly thereafter the area became known for its rare mud springs. Even the crown prince and other members of the Japanese nobility counted Guanziling among their favorite hot spring sites.

Today there are plenty of different types of hot spring spas here to choose from.

The hot springs at Guanziling are fed by turbid mineral-rich water that is said to enhance both beauty and health. A number of large-scale hot spring spas have opened here in recent years to cater to the growing ranks of hot spring bathers.

✂ The swimming suit/trunk and swimming cap are required.

Baihe Lotus Field: Baihe is counted as one of the seven major ancient districts of Tainan City, and intensive planting in recent years has also made it the largest producer of lotus seeds and lotus roots in all of Taiwan. This town has been given the name "Lotus Country" because of its unending expanses of lotus fields, which give it some of the island's most unique farm scenery. The lotuses blossom most luxuriantly from June to September each year, and at this time the town organizes a series of Lotus Festival activities. If you want to see lotus blossoms at their loveliest, you will have to get up very early in the morning to view them and to savor the sweet rural life of southern Taiwan.
